for each it establishes an adjustment board and an appeal commission. No penalty strike or lockout is imposed and membership on all six of the boards would be restricted to the workers and their employers and divided equally between them.

Both the roads and the employees would be directed by the plan, as written into the bill, to exert every reasonable effort and adopt every available means to avoid an interruption of traffic and to this end the three boards of adjustment would be created, these being substantially the same as those existing under the railroad administration.

The three adjustment boards would each deal with disputes of certain classes of the 14 railway unions. One board would include representatives of the four big brotherhoods, the engineers, the firemen, the conductors and the trainmen, another would include the machinists, the boiler-makers, the blacksmiths, the carmen, the sheet metal workers and the electrical workers, and the third would include the telegraphers, the switchmen, the railway clerks, the way and shop laborers. Railway executives would name four, six and four representatives, respectively, as members of these boards.

Corresponding to each board there also would be set up a commissioner to consider appeals, which could be sent to them by half the members of a board. These commissions would be of the same size as the boards, with the select method of choosing members obtaining, but with double membership between boards and commissions prohibited. Headquarters of all six tribunals would be in Washington.

hargaining with decisions binding in law.

"The time is at hand," he said, "when we must furnish suitable machinery for industrial justice, at least so far as those vital enterprises are concerned upon which our life depends. The processes of justice imply that the parties to the dispute cannot take the law into their own hands, and sacrifice the peace and well-being of the community to their contentions.

"With the apostrophe of violence silenced, the scheme of justice to disorder and revolution frustrated, law and order preserved, with an inflexible demand for loyalty on the part of the public servants, with provision for the peaceful and just settlement of industrial disputes, thus making possible effective measures against interruption of essential services to the community, we should go forward making these things impossible.

"We have made little progress in providing the machinery for industrial justice, and in this respect we are still unprepared. We are still at the stage corresponding to that of trial by battle and trial by ordeal in the early law of procedure. But we cannot go on indefinitely in this way. What is absolutely necessary as I have pointed out in the case of the basic industries, upon which the community's life depends, is clearly through the field of industrial activity, although when the vital interest of the community is not involved, the plan should not go further than to facilitate and enforce agreement.

miners and operators to discuss separately the plan which would be most acceptable to each.

Conflict Develops

Indication of a conflict in the scope of the agreement to be negotiated, involving the question of recognition of non-union workers developed at the outset of the conference and became more apparent in the two group meetings which followed.

Discussion in the miners' caucus which followed the conference session, hinged on the question whether operators representing both union and non-union fields would be included in the conference and the effect any agreement reached by the conference might have in those fields where the miners do not have contracts with operators. Although officers of the United Mine Workers refused to make any statement following their meeting, it was stated that the plan for a non-union side conference was favored, but before any proposal is agreed to Secretary Wilson will be asked to make clear to the conference that the rights of organized labor are to be protected in those districts where the mining unions are so recognized by the coal companies.

Operators, however, did not look with favor on an agreement covering all fields. The Washington wage agreement for the first time, the operators asserted, fixed the same date for the expiration of contracts between miners and operators in all parts of the country. Fear of the power of this arrangement gives the workers to bring about a nationwide strike was expressed by the operators, who indicated a desire to return to the old plan of having all wage scale contracts on the agreement reached in the central competitive fields.

Owners of mines outside of the central competitive fields conferred before the opening of the conference and opposition was expressed to participation in the negotiations.

Owing to the likelihood of protracted discussion on the scope of the conference before even the demands of the miners are brought into issue many on both sides of the controversy predicted today that the sessions might continue several weeks.

ultra modern provisions of the new constitution. In his letter de Negri writes that "only Russia by nationalizing lands, has gone further than we have." De Negri's letter, as it comes to the government's hands, says in part:

"It would not only be sad, but even criminal, that we should abdicate our nationalization policy through threats of Wall street capitalists. I believe this is an ideal time in which to secure Mexican petroleum once for all, since it means nothing less than our greatest wealth, so coveted by foreign interests."
